Student internships increasing

By Judi Thompson

Kaimin Reporter

Last year, the University of Montana Cooperative Education office placed more than 350 students in internships, and even more internships are available this year.

Barbara Olson, director of Cooperative Education, said 25 positions are listed now and new listing are constantly coming into her office.

Olson credits the increase to intense recruiting by her staff. Staff members travel across the state looking for businesses interested in hiring interns, she said.

Internships are open to all students, Olson said, although students generally are not placed until their sophomore year. Applicants must have a 2.0 grade-point average, but employers often look for higher GPAs, she said.

Internships are available in every academic field, Olson said. When soliciting internships, she explained, the staff seeks an equal number in each area. While that balance may not always be attained, she said, many individual employers offer a variety of positions, so no one area receives disproportionately more opportunities.

For example, the Montana Power Company has hired UM interns from the journalism school, the business school, the drama department and the UM Maureen and Mike Mansfield Library.

What many students fail to realize is that most internships are essentially courses taken outside the university, said Melanie Hoell, a cooperative education counselor. Students must register and pay fees for the credits they receive just as they would for any other courses.

Olson explained that internship credit is determined by the departments and professional schools. She said the individual departments establish internship guidelines and also appoint an adviser to help and supervise the interns.

Not all interns earn credit, Hoell said. Some employers do not insist that credit be given and some students do not need it, she explained.

Just as credit varies, so too does pay, Olson explained. Some interns receive an hourly wage, while others earn quarterly or monthly salaries. Still others work as volunteers just to get the experience.

In order to obtain an internship and insure receiving credit for it, a student must submit an application, resume, transcript and a letter of interest to the Cooperative Education office. Then, just before the start of the job, the student must sign a learning agreement.

Internships provide real-world experience, Hoell said. Interns see how businesses function and they learn to work with fellow employees. After interning and actually working in a field, many students change career directions or enroll in courses outside of their major that they know will benefit them on the job. For example, she said, many students discover the importance of typing in many jobs and enroll in typing courses following their internships.

Employers seldom complain about UM interns, Hoell said. In fact, she said, "Most rave over the interns."

For the most part, Olson added, student interns serve as the most effective ambassadors of the university.

Students are encouraged to seek internships on their own, Hoell said, adding, however, that they can only be assured of receiving credit for the internship by working through the cooperative education office. If students find an internship opening, they should notify the office and work out the credit details with the department advisers and cooperative education counselors, she said.

OVERDONE POLITICAL COVERAGE was one of the topics raised during a question-and-answer session with veteran NBC correspondent Jack Perkins yesterday in the Journalism School library.

NBC reporter says politics overplayed

By Pam Newbern

Kaimin News Editor

Political events such as conventions and campaigns are often over-reported, according to Jack Perkins, an NBC correspondent who held a question-and-answer session yesterday afternoon in the Journalism School library.

"Conventions are about as meaningful as the Electoral College," Perkins told an audience of about 30 people. He said members of the media are bored with today's conventions after such riotous ones as the 1968 Democratic Convention in Chicago.

"We realize now we're not going to cover a story," he said, explaining there is little news in the convention. "We're going to cover a spectacle of no meaning whatsoever."

Perkins, a 23-year veteran with NBC, was in Missoula to speak to the Chamber of Commerce. He wrote for the Chet Huntley-David Brinkley news program and later covered the Vietnam War and political events.

In addition to conventions, Perkins said coverage of campaigns and primaries is also overdone.

"Generally, I think what they (the networks) need to do is de-emphasize the endless schedule of primaries."

Perkins said the analysis following the debate between President Ronald Reagan and Democratic challenger Walter Mondale on Sunday was "superficial" because it was concerned with "whether the president looked tired" rather than See "Perkins," page 8.

Proposed Flathead Lake location

Mansfield site purchase 'up in air'

By Brett French

Kaimin Reporter

Lack of money has left the purchase of Rocky Point Lodge as the Flathead site for the Mansfield Center "up in the air," according to Bruce Sievers, a member of the site-selection committee.

If purchased, the eight-bedroom lodge, on Flathead Lake northwest of Polson, would accommodate visiting dignitaries for conferences on Pacific affairs. According to Sievers, the committee has decided to pursue purchasing the lodge because of its suitability.

A sister center, the Mansfield Center at the University of Montana, will focus on academic study of Pacific affairs. The centers are named in honor of Mike Mansfield, a former U.S. Senator from Montana and now ambassador to Japan.

The Mansfield Foundation, which raises money for both centers, has raised about $5.35 million so far.

However, Congress appropriated $5 million but stipulated that none of it be used for construction of facilities.

The Montana Legislature also appropriated $1 million, but that money cannot be used until other donations reach $6 million.

Mark Hungerford, the site-selection committee chairman, has acted on his own, with the committee's support, to buy the $1.45-million lodge.

However, nearby residents already have voiced concern about the possible location of the center.

Adjoining landowners say the center could cause congestion on the dirt access road and create sewage problems in the area. Sievers said the foundation is trying to take those concerns into account and will deal with problems as they arise.

Economic irony

The last time a popular, conservative president ran against a liberal challenger, college students were a factor in the election for the first time. Taking advantage of that new voting block, the challenger, George McGovern, played the campuses and found his most ardent supporters there. The incumbent, Richard Nixon, conceded the student vote.

But that was a vastly different era. Now, the conservative incumbent, Ronald Reagan, is turning to the campuses. In fact, people under age 30 have become his largest group of supporters.

It is not difficult to understand the radical change in the past decade. Still mired in the Vietnam War, the nation in 1972 was just winding down from one of the most turbulent decades in its history. Young adults, faced with fighting a futile war, had more at stake than any other voting bloc. It was natural that they became actively involved in McGovern's anti-war campaign.

Editorial

On the other hand, the early 1980s have been a time of relative tranquility. Students now face no direct threat. Most have become indifferent to concerns outside of their own economic success. They have seen only two presidents—Jimmy Carter and Ronald Reagan—and they associate Carter with recession and Reagan with prosperity. As a part of the Carter administration, Walter Mondale is associated with economic instability.

It is sadly ironic that Reagan is winning support based on his economic performance. Granted, economic conditions are better today than they were four years ago, but to credit Reagan with the turnaround is nearsighted. Of all the areas he can influence, the president has the least control over economics. Everyone, from legislators to special interest groups to the Federal Reserve Board, and everything, from the wheat harvest to the price of foreign oil, affects the economy.

Reagan also seems to have little control over the budget process. In his first term, Reagan increased the national debt by more than a half-trillion dollars, and the Congressional Budget Office has projected that deficits under Reagan will be more than $250 billion annually by the end of the decade. That is more deficit spending in one year than any other president had in four years and more than 10 times the deficit of Carter's last budget.

Some occasional deficit spending is necessary to stimulate the economy. For now, Reagan's deficits have done just that. But soon, the borrowing required to service the huge debt will force up interest rates again. Consumption will decline, production will fall and unemployment will increase. In short, the economy will falter just about the time the college students who now support Reagan enter the job market.

Turning around Reagan's favorite line, Mondale has asked Americans not whether they are better off now, but whether they will be better off four years from now. It is clear, from the way Reagan has set the stage for collapse, the answer must be no.

Mondale has expressed a concern over the deficits and outlined a politically bold plan to reduce them. Reagan's only response has been to stick to the policy of wishing the debt away. He understands that proposing to raise taxes does not win votes. But the voters should realize that taxes must go up or they should prepare to stand in the soup line.

Reagan's Isolation:

Mondale's Isolation:

Carrying On — by Bill Thomas As Long as the Sun Shall Shine

Congratulations to the Confederated Salish-Kootenai Indian tribes. They went up against Montana Power Company (MPC) in a struggle to control their own resources and walked away with a good portion of what they were after.

At issue was an application by the Salish-Kootenai for the federal license to operate Kerr Dam. The dam, located near Polson on tribal land, is operated by MPC.

An agreement worked out last week will allow MPC to continue operating the dam for the next 30 years, after which the tribe will assume control. Also, the rent paid by MPC to the tribe will triple from its present beads-and-trinkets level.

The Salish-Kootenai had to overcome stiff resistance for the victory. One line of resistance took the form of a slick 'circle-the-wagons' public-relations campaign by MPC. The company was portrayed as a mighty consumer champion holding the line against the cunning savages who, without the righteous interdiction of MPC, would come storming out of the Flathead to pillage and sack Montana ratepayers.

Worse yet, according to the company line, the tribes would sell the power to out-of-state utilities at market prices. MPC, on the other hand, would show the same consideration to ratepayers, in-state working people and county taxes for which they are so well noted.

This from the same outfit that tried to foist Colstrip 3 onto Montana ratepayers, that has been charged with favoring out-of-state workers for construction jobs, and, some suspect, that got the BPA (a federal agency exempt from property taxes) to operate its transmission lines to avoid paying county taxes.

Another line of resistance came in the resolutions passed by the Missoula City Council and County Commissioners supporting MPC. The mayor was outraged that anyone would even suggest that "a bunch of Indians" could operate the dam.

The technical argument was that the tribe had not shown an ability to market the power. There's a catch to this argument: you need the license to market the power and you need the market to get the license. However, power from Kerr Dam is cheap, only a fraction of the cost of Colstrip or nuclear-generated power. Do you suppose that anyone would have trouble selling it?

Let's imagine for a moment that the Salish-Kootenai had not revealed themselves as an applicant for the license and we knew only of another 'interested party.' Would the same mayoral demagoguery have surfaced? Would our local public officials have passed the same smug resolutions?

Some have suggested that the ugly face of racism is a thing of the past, reflected only in a distant mirror. How far in the past was last summer?

My aunt Nell used to scare my brother and I during summer visits with tales that her house had been built on an Indian graveyard. Lying in bed at night, we worked up quite a fright imagining those old Iroquois bones calling out from the basement. That, of course, was childhood fantasy. But in a very real sense this beautiful 'house of sky' we live in, Montana, has been built on a graveyard of broken bones and dreams. Take a walk through the Big Hole Battlefield. Do you hear the voice of conscience calling out from below?

We need to confront our duplicity. Do we really believe in self-determination for Native Americans or, as seemed the case with Kerr Dam, only when and how it suits us?

Barring doomsday, we all have to live with each other in this house for as long as the sun shall shine and the grass shall grow. Let's open the door.

Granolaphobia

EDITOR: Mr. Venola, your Granola article has set my mind to thinking. Granted, you had a good time poking fun at the Granolas. However, your attack on what I consider a minority group on this campus makes me wonder: Are you afraid of them? Do they threaten you?

Your mention of the Granolas reaping the benefits of government student loans might have some basis. Why don't you do a study on the percentage of Granolas who receive student loans. In fact, 60 percent of University of Montana students benefit from some federal loan program. I can hardly believe that 60 percent of the student body is comprised of Granolas.

Mr. Venola, since you categorize and stereotype people, would it be fair to assume that you're a great admirer of John Wayne. It's time for you to come down from riding high in your saddle. Those Granola "females (who) tend toward solid construction" are just too much excitement for you.

Personally, I find it intriguing and comforting to see a few Granolas around. Perhaps their virtue is that they are not quite as willing to conform as some of us. Their virtue reminds me of the freedom that exists in this country. And their choice of "Granola" clothes gives me hope that, just maybe, we're not all turning into conservative clones.

DAMM

EDITOR: I'm not sure what other students have to say but, personally, I'm tired of hearing from MADD (Mothers Against Drunk Drivers).

Although many students undoubtedly use happy hours to attain a certain extreme degree of drunkenness, this is not necessarily the rule.

Secondly, if students so choose, they may bop on over to a local store and pick up the needed supplies. Students may choose where they want to buy their liquor, how much they want to buy and how fast they want to consume it, provided they are old enough to buy it.

I can appreciate MADD's stand against drunk drivers, yet I'm left wondering what might cure this drunk-driving problem which leaves so many mad mothers frothing at the mouth. (Prohibition, maybe?).

Possibly the solution could begin at home. Prudent drinking habits exhibited by adults would certainly be a positive influence on teenagers and observing mature drinking habits could cause teens to emulate "grown-up" behavior. This should help fight the problem of drunk drivers.

Finally, what may be needed is a counter organization to equalize the excessive noise MADD broadcasts so rabidly. It could be called DAMM (Drunks Against Mad Mothers). It could have club officers, go out lobbying and everything.

UM health service offers cheap foot fix

By Kevin Twidwell
Kaimin Contributing Reporter

Since 1980 the Student Health Service at the University of Montana has been helping students stay on their feet.

Students with foot problems can obtain help from the health service in the form of orthotics. Orthotics, or inlays, are rigid plastic supports placed in shoes to correct foot deformities and prevent the foot from making abnormal motions.

Dr. Jack Bruckner, the physician in charge of the orthotic program at the health service, said knee problems, sore legs, tendon problems, shin splints and other common complaints can be symptoms of a foot deformity. He said the most common foot deformity he sees at the health service is over-pronation.

Over-pronation occurs when the foot rolls inward more than it should, causing the alignment of the knee to the rest of the leg to change. Bruckner said a certain amount of pronation is needed to absorb shock, but problems such as shin splints, sore feet and sore legs can appear when the foot rolls in too much.

Orthotics give the foot the needed support to stop over-pronation, Bruckner said.

Active people with foot problems need orthotics more than inactive people do, according to Pat Nygaard, the supervisor of the orthotics and X-ray departments at the health service. She said foot problems usually arise when the person does a lot of physical activity, such as jogging. "We get a lot of athletes and recreational runners" who need the devices to continue their activities, she said.

Orthotics aren't the answer to all foot problems, Bruckner said, adding that only one out of five patients he sees with foot problems needs orthotics. He said some people are "sloppy runners" that need to learn to run correctly. Other people may be able to solve their foot problems by using the correct shoe or by exercising weak leg muscles.

Bruckner suggested that anyone with leg or foot problems should go to the health service and have a complete leg and foot examination to determine the problem.

If a student is diagnosed as needing orthotics, he or she can have them made at the health service.

Nygaard said it takes about one week to get the orthotics to the student because the service is in high demand. She said the health service has made an average of 130 pairs of orthotics a year since the program started. She said that before the health service offered the service, students were referred to a local podiatrist.

The health service charges a fee of $50 to cover the costs of the materials, while orthotics purchased in the public sector can cost $200-$300, Nygaard said.

Patricia Bodner, a sophomore at UM, said she saved more than $200 by purchasing her orthotics at the health service.

"I was impressed with the doctors and the attention I was given at the health service," she said. "They were professional and the price allowed me to get the new inlays, which I really needed."

Bruckner is the only doctor at the health service who makes casts for orthotics. Dr. Nick Williams, a podiatrist at the Western Montana Clinic in Missoula, is a consultant at the health service, and sees patients with difficult foot problems on Fridays.

Dr. David Jacobson, an orthopedic surgeon, is also a consultant to the health service.

Sports

Squad needs road split

By Linda Reaves

UM Sports Information

The University of Montana volleyball team takes to the road for critical Mountain West Conference matches against Idaho State and Weber State this weekend.

UM coach Dick Scott stressed the importance of the matches, "This is a crucial weekend for all three teams involved," he said. "We need at least a split to get back in the conference race." UM is 5-14 overall and 1-3 in conference action.

Scott identified part of the reason for the team's slow start: "We can play with anyone in this conference, but we have to play with intensity and consistency. We haven't done that yet this year."

This weekend's matches take on special significance because Montana is tied for fifth place in the conference with ISU and Weber. With a sweep, UM would bypass them, and perhaps Montana State too, which presently holds possession of fourth place.

To take both matches, Scott feels the Lady Griz will need to be aggressive. "We have to go out and play our own game. We can't afford to let the other team control the momentum."

Last weekend Montana dropped two conference matches. They lost to Boise State 15-5, 15-8 and 15-11 on Thursday night, and then traveled to Portland State where they bowed down 15-7, 7-15, 15-4 and 15-7.

Senior co-captain Mary Beth Dungan has led UM in kills and digs throughout the season, currently tallying 239 and 125 in those areas, respectively. She currently ranks 10th in the nation in kill average, according to Collegiate Volleyball Association rankings.

Senior Mary Pederson, the other co-captain, is the Lady Grizzlies' leader in assists, with 537, and aces, with 20.

Other team leaders include juniors Nan Kuenzel, with the highest hitting percentage on the team at .329, and Laura Slanec, leading in blocks with 68.

The Lady Grizzlies next home match is Tuesday Oct. 16 against rival Montana State. Later in that week, on Oct. 19 and 20, the team will host their own tournament, the Glacier Invitational.

Lady Griz cagers begin season practice

The University of Montana women's basketball team opened practice for the 1984-85 season yesterday.

UM is the defending Mountain West Conference champion, and returns three starters and nine letterwinners from last year's 27-4 squad.

They begin their season Nov. 19 at home against Washington State.

The men's basketball team opens their practice for the upcoming season on Monday Oct. 15.

The Griz have two starters and seven letterwinners returning from last year's team, which posted the second best record in the school's history, a 23-7 mark.

UM begins its season Nov. 16 at home against Simon Fraser University.

Cozzens sees deficit as major problem

By Brian Justice

Kaimin Reporter

Controlling the federal deficit is the "number one issue in American politics" today, according to Republican Chuck Cozzens, a Montana candidate for the U.S. Senate.

Cozzens, in an interview yesterday, said decreasing the deficit is important, but he added that "raising taxes is absolutely the last resort" toward solving the country's financial problems.

Yesterday was the first of two days that Cozzens will spend campaigning on the University of Montana campus. He will be speaking in political science classes at UM today.

Cozzens will face Democratic incumbent Max Baucus and Libertarian Neil Halprin in the upcoming November election.

Cozzens said that the deficit could be reduced by cutting "things that bust the budget."

This could be accomplished by giving the president "line-item-veto power."

"It's because of congressmen like Baucus who approve spending bills," Cozzens said.

Cozzens accused Baucus of being "sloppy and irresponsible" in governmental spending.

"Baucus never had to balance a budget," Cozzens said, adding that Baucus "has no business experience."

Cozzens said that he supports the Republican Party's conservative way of thinking because he feels that high interest and inflation rates have been reduced under the Reagan administration.

"When Jimmy Carter left office in 1981" there were "high inflation and interest rates," Cozzens said. "That's what liberal programs brought to us."

The conservative policies initiated by the Reagan administration, Cozzens said, have reduced inflation and interest rates from 15 to 4 percent.

Policies initiated by presidents can last as long as 20 years, Cozzens said, adding that if conservative policies are implemented into future administrations, there will be a "sound economy" with people not being "head-over-heals in debt."

Cozzens also said he is "terribly excited" about the improved relations between Canada and the United States since last month's election of Progressive Conservative Prime Minister Brian Mulroney.

Cozzens said the Canadians are looking at the five million jobs created by the Reagan administration since the recession in 1981 and saying, "What are they doing down there."

Alcohol Awareness Week OCTOBER 8th - 14th

Somebody do something about alcohol abuse.

Alcoholism and other forms of alcohol abuse are problems affecting each of us throughout this community. The tragic consequences of irresponsible behavior when drinking... particularly drunken driving... have led to fervent cries of "somebody do something."

Well, it's time to do something, and that somebody is each one of us.

Because we are each affected by the problem, we must each become part of the answer.

One way of becoming part of that answer is by supporting alcohol education programs designed to provide the information necessary upon which people can form proper decisions about drinking. Decisions which will lead to healthy attitudes and responsible behavior.

That's one way we can get involved.

There are others.

We need to carry what is taught in schools into our communities; into our everyday lives.

Each of us must become a living example of responsible attitudes and behavior.

We each must demonstrate our responsibility by our personal actions.

That means examining how we drink and when we drink. It means being responsible hosts, more concerned with our guests' health and safety, than in seeing that glasses are filled.

It means not condoning or reinforcing irresponsible drinking behavior.

We can each be a part of the answer if we work together.

What we do does make a difference.

CB to discuss code tonight

By Dave Fisher
Kaimin Reporter

Central Board will comment on the University of Montana administration's latest draft of a student conduct code when it meets tonight at 7:00 in the University Center Montana Rooms.

If comments are short, CB may also vote to accept or reject the code, according to ASUM President Phoebe Patterson.

The code defines what the administration considers unacceptable personal and academic behavior on the UM campus. Plagiarism, cheating and tampering with course materials are among actions banned by the code.

CB rejected an earlier draft of the code last spring. CB members and Patterson said the proposal would have given faculty members and the UM administration power to punish students accused of misconduct before the charges could be tried.

The code also outlines the functions of the University Court, where accused students are tried and describes the punishments that may be inflicted by the court.

According to UM Legal Representative Mary Beth Kurz, recent court decisions have prompted universities to rewrite student conduct codes to allow for due process. Existing codes, which were written in the late 1960s, failed to explicitly state that right.

Under existing codes and the latest proposal, students found guilty of misconduct may be expelled from school, suspended, reprimanded, placed on probation, made to pay restitution or given a failing grade in class.

Patterson said Tuesday that she hopes the revised draft will eliminate the possibility of unfair punishment, but she doesn't know how CB will react to the revisions.

Michael Easton, UM vice president for university relations, said last week that the new code will not take effect until ASUM and the Faculty Senate have commented on it, even though the administration can put the code into effect without faculty or student approval.

the issues.

"There was precious little attempt made for someone to tell the truth," he said, explaining that the candidates presented two versions of an issue, and the media did not try to find out which one was right.

Perkins also answered questions on exit polls and the controversy over the finances of the husband of Geraldine Ferraro, the Democratic candidate for vice-president.

"Exit-polling is legitimate and overdone," Perkins said. One way to eliminate the problem of East Coast exit-poll results being announced before western states have voted would be to open and close all the voting places across the country at the same time, he said.
